To further complicate the issue, Haywood (1986) notes that while children may be more successful in catching a larger ball, they also are likely to exhibit more mature catching form with smaller balls (which is contrary to the observations of Wellman, 1937). These apparent contradictions appear to be related to a general disregard for (a) differences in the goals of the various catching tasks (Payne, 1982) and, more important, (b) the size of the ball relative to the size of the performer (e.g., in terms of a ball size/body size ratio).
