There Are Monkeys in This Book

Kate Coombs

From a talk for the BYU Reading Council

I used to teach for Los Angeles Unified School District in their home-hospital school, which meant I drove around instructing children with medical problems that kept them out of school. Of course I brought the kids good books. I remember showing Esphyr Slobodkina’s Caps for Sale to a 6-year-old named Anna, who was recovering from having an eye removed as part of her cancer treatment. She immediately recognized the book. She wanted to hold it. Her face lit up, and she leaned forward to whisper some vital information: “There are monkeys in this book.”

What books make your face light up? Have you ever looked up at the end of a book and couldn’t remember who you are or where you were? Have you ever read a book more than once? Maybe three times or ten times. Has a book ever torn your heart out? Has a book ever made you long to be older, taller, better? Or maybe just to catch the train to Hogwarts? Have the characters in a book and their troubles ever felt real to you? Did your mom or dad read a certain book to you that you’ve never forgotten? What books are still in your heart?

Benefits in Pleasure

For many, “reading for pleasure” has been replaced by reading for testing. But from an instructional standpoint, reading pleasure is actually reading practice. Just the way we expect a student of piano or tennis or math to practice, we must expect our students to practice reading. Malcolm Gladwell (2008) found it takes 10,000 hours (or 20 years) to become an expert at something. Thus students should be putting in far more than 10 minutes of reading in class every day or so.

First, regular (even extensive) reading practice improves school performance, especially when it comes to the infamous “fourth grade slump,” as Jeanne S. Chall (Chall & Jacobs, 1983) calls the drop in reading that hits many students at about that point. That’s the time when reading gets harder, as we introduce textbooks and push kids to absorb content in new ways. That, sadly, is when reading tends to stop being fun and become a chore. Ironically, continuing to read for pleasure will make it easier for students to access increasingly difficult textbooks in the fourth through twelfth grades and beyond. And yes, it will help them with those ubiquitous standardized tests.

What’s more, regular reading is a powerful tool for teaching kids to write. I’m a published author, and while I’ve had a few good writing teachers along the way, they’re not the ones who really taught me to write. My best writing teachers were the hundreds of books I read as a child and into my teens and adulthood. Not only do books teach young readers how stories are constructed—plot, character, setting, and theme—but they also teach children how a paragraph is put together. Even more important, they teach young readers how a sentence is put together. Think of those thousands and thousands of sentences being read, all modeling how to compose the most vital structure of our written language.

As we recognize benefits, we naturally ask how we can promote reading for pleasure—AKA reading for practice. Here’s what not to do: A mother I know assigned her 10-year-old son to read Moby Dick. Because it’s a classic. When I heard about that, I cringed, and not just because I had personally started reading the book at one point in my life and been bored to tears. No, I wondered whether this boy’s burgeoning interest in reading could survive his being forced to slog through something so clearly inappropriate for his age and personal interests. What next, Anna Karenina?

The Kid-Book Match

If kids are going to get the practice they need, they must like reading. And that will happen only if we match the right book to the right child.

Kinds and interests. I recently polled a group of 16 kids at a summer writing camp about their favorite books. A week later I polled another 10 kids at an informal author’s visit. They mostly named books like the Fablehaven and Harry Potter series and, for the older kids, the Hunger Games books. I did hear a few Anne of Green Gables and some dragon books. One girl staunchly listed a couple of contemporary realism titles. A younger girl liked the Magic Tree House series. You will find that most kids, and in fact most readers, are fans of (1) sci-fi/fantasy or (2) contemporary realism, historical fiction, and nonfiction. Even the little omnivores tend to lean more one way than another. It’s important for you to find out which of the two directions your children or students are leaning.

Many boys are drawn to nonfiction. You may have heard talk about boys who are reluctant readers and the importance of meeting their needs. You’ve surely noticed that boys are often outside playing sports or inside playing video games. These activities create fierce competition for reading, which can seem passive by contrast. Another issue is that there’s such as big push for fiction in schools that boys who aren’t sci-fi/fantasy fans may not know about the availability of appealing nonfiction and action or sports fiction. Sports and science magazines and books like the Eyewitness series can be very satisfying to this group. You can also try books such as Grossology. These are disgusting but fascinating—and they’re really just science in disguise.

Levels. Readers fall along a range of motivation. We don’t usually worry about avid readers, and with good reason. But even they can benefit from being introduced to new authors, titles, and series. One of my nieces simply read the Twilight books over and over until I introduced her to Sarah Dessen’s books and other YA options.

At the other end of the spectrum we get reluctant readers. A lot of time is cheerfully, hopefully wasted on trying to get them to read at all. This time tends to be wasted because, even with all our good intentions, we often try to force these kids to read books that are a little or a lot too hard for them. Let reluctant readers choose simpler books! Not boring ones, simpler ones. It’s easy to overshoot on the reading level. Don’t forget that kids need to know 95% of the words on a page to be able to read independently. Not 70. Not 80. But 95. So please, dial it down. A tactic that also helps is to read together: “I’ll read the right-hand pages, and you read the left-hand ones. If you get stuck on a big word, just tell me and I’ll help you.”

A secret weapon to use with reluctant and less interested readers is graphic novels. Once I was talking to a teacher named Lydia in the resource room, and she told me her worries about her own daughter, a 10-year-old who was struggling in school and basically hated reading. I grabbed one of Jennifer and Matthew Holms’ Babymouse graphic novels off the shelf and said, “Try this.” My friend made a face and said that it wasn’t a real book. “Trust me,” I told her. So she gave it a shot—and came back ecstatic. “She loves them!” Lydia said. “She’s never even liked a book before!” I’ve had similar results with giving Jarrett Krosoczka’s Lunch Lady books to second-grade boys (and some first graders). Graphic novels, in addition to their inherent value as stories, are less intimidating than regular prose books and act as a great steppingstone into reading. They do this by calming down kids who don’t trust books to be kind to them.

Of course the majority of kids fall somewhere in the middle of this spectrum. They may enjoy a good book every so often, but they don’t seek out books. They can usually find something to do other than reading, such as texting. I see this group as being at high risk when it comes to reading because the potential is there, but it’s just not happening. So the crippling effects, while they are more subtle than those of reluctant readers, are nonetheless real. Such kids read enough to keep teachers off their backs, but their general apathy about reading is a problem for our society and its hopes.

Only the Best

What you do when you give children books is define the idea of a book. Let that definition be wonderful!

Boring? Confusing? Kids sometimes want to read the dreck known as TV and movie tie-ins. They do need to choose what they read, but keep your eye on the prize: Provide kids with the best books you possibly can. One mother told me that she just buys her kids books at the thrift store so she doesn’t have to deal with library due dates and fines. I was not happy to hear this. I’ve seen the selection at thrift stores, and it isn’t outstanding. Don’t define books for your children as “boring” or “low quality.”

I once used a reading program with first graders that came with a set of little phonics-based books. I took one look and refused to use them. Somebody had decided to allow no sight words in those things. None. Unfortunately, this decision resulted in books that didn’t even make sense to me, let alone to my students, who were English language learners. “But those are just for decoding practice,” the teacher next door said. “No,” I told her. “When we hand these to beginning readers, we’re telling them that this is what a book is, this strange, unpleasant, incomprehensible little thing.” They were terrible representatives of their species.

Now if you’re not sure what books are great, read some of the publications for librarians and booksellers. For example, I take the Horn Book to keep current.

Whose classics? Even some of the Newbery Award books, especially the older ones, can be stodgy. And while I personally love Charlotte’s Web, I remember giving it to an athletic fourth-grade girl who said plaintively, “I’m sorry, Ms. Coombs, but it’s kind of boring. Do you have another one like Charlie and the Chocolate Factory?” Roald Dahl’s books are pretty timeless.

There’s a term they’ve been using in children’s book publishing for the past 10–15 years: quiet. A quiet book may work for the avid reader and for the quiet child, but it can feel draggy to many of today’s children. Sure, you can do some read-alouds with the most striking of these books, but don’t hand them out for individual reading except to those children who truly have the interest and personality to match. I just heard about a short summer reading list that included Number the Stars, Trumpet of the Swans, and others like them. No choices given: just read these. They may be admirable books, but they are not destined to make every kid in the class a more enthusiastic reader. They’re an especially poor selection for most boys. In general, fast-paced is a better idea for today’s kids. It’s one of the reasons for the popularity of Rick Riordan’s The Lightning Thief and other adventures of Percy Jackson.

Love them, share them. If you don’t love books, you’re in real trouble. It’s like those celebrities who used to pitch soft drinks they never touched in real life. They are now required to use those products—and so are you. Be a reader. Live the dream. Your missionary zeal will shine as you share your love of the printed page (or Kindle) with your students. I once had a first grade student write in her daily journal, “Ms. Coombs doesn’t just like books. She loves books.” I read that particular class the best books I could possibly find every day after lunch. Filet mignon, not hamburger. I bought a wildly cool classroom library and kept the books in baskets on my students’ desk clusters, rotating the baskets every week. I made books seem like the best thing in the universe. It wasn’t too hard because I’m a believer. The next year a baffled second grade teacher approached me and said, “I don’t get it. Our class had a scheduling conflict, and we had to choose between going to the computer lab and the library. The kids who were in your class last year banded together and said, ‘Let’s go to the library! It’s way more fun!’”

Matchmaking

Help children find the books that will enthrall them and sing in their hearts for years to come. It’s not quite as hard as it sounds.

Find. First, find out what books kids have liked best in the past. Don’t worry if these are picture books. If students can’t think of any, ask them what movies and TV shows they like. Humor? Action? Horror? Is this child mostly a sci-fi/fantasy fan, or perhaps a reader of contemporary fiction, historical fiction, and nonfiction?

Do your homework—or find a librarian to help you. You can google lists of good books in specific genres. Certain bloggers specialize in children’s books, usually librarians or teachers (e.g., Watch. Connect. Read., or A Fuse #8 Production, or Jen Robinson’s Book Page). Find out which books are popular with kids right now. Take a poll of your class or even of your school. What books do children tell each other about?

Introduce. When you’re ready, give students a pitch and some choices. I always try to hand a child six books I think she will like, six books that fit her profile. I tell my student a little about each book or just have her read the jacket copy of each one. Then I encourage her to take the two or three she likes best and try them out. Not just one. “Read a little of each one and see how it goes.” The message is “See how it is with books? You have options. You have opportunities!”

Engage. Don’t forget the follow-up. “What happened?” It’s like gossip. “What did [main character’s name] do since we last talked? Did he solve that problem with his friend or make things worse?” I don’t mean quiz the young reader; I mean take a sincere interest in the events of the book—whether you’ve read it or not. Let students tell you, or at least tell their book groups, what’s going on in their books. What’s the scoop? This is just plain fun, and it makes the books matter more. It gives them heft and presence in children’s lives.

Try some of these. Now I can’t leave you without some recommendations. Here are a few more secret weapons—books that grab a lot of kids. Along with the Lunch Lady books, a good pick for first and second grade boys is the Dragonbreath series. Then hit the second- and third-grade boys with Captain Underpants. For boys ages 9 to 13, the Diary of a Wimpy Kid series is usually a winner. Second and third graders who are less fantasy inclined may also get hooked on the Magic Tree House books (more historical fiction than fantasy) and the Boxcar Children. And yes, the Goosebumps series is still a real draw for young fans of the shivers.

Roald Dahl’s books are also beloved, though they are a little harder to read if kids are struggling. Many upper grade readers love the Harry Potter and Percy Jackson books, while many readers in middle school and high school thrive on the Hunger Games trilogy. For reluctant and struggling readers in fourth through ninth grades, I recommend Gordon Korman’s adventure series (e.g., On the Run and Island). See also sports books by Tim Green and Dan Gutman, though these aren’t quite as easy to read.

Then there are a myriad of titles and series that are not as well known, but have great appeal for individual children. For example, I was finally able to hook my cousin’s fifth-grade son on a book called The Fourth Stall. And I just loaned a 10-year-old girl Ella Enchanted.

You can do it. Give the right book to the right child, and watch the magic.
References

Children’s Books Cited

Only the recommended books are listed. Those mentioned briefly to contrast have not been included.

Kate Coombs received the 2013 Lee Bennett Hopkins Poetry Award for her book Water Sings Blue. Her other books include The Runaway Princess, The Runaway Dragon, The Secret Keeper, Hans my Hedgehog, and Goodnight Mr. Darcy. Her seventh book, The Tooth Fairy Wars, is due out in July. She lives in Utah, where she works as a curriculum developer.
This book is lovely, the stories are great - any child who knows the 5 little monkeys songs from school/nursery will love this. Great value for money as it has 5 stories in it, and stickers too. Would highly recommend it. "Mother, look," she said. "There (to be) a monkey in this cage. It (to eat) an apple. Now it (to give) a bite to another monkey. I (to think) monkeys (to like) apples very much." "Yes, dear," said her mother. "Now I (to want) to go and see the lions and tigers. Where they (to live), mother?" "In that big house over there. Come along." Agnes enjoyed herself very much in the lion house. "Mother," she said, "the tiger (to want) a drink: it (to go) to the dish of water there in the corner. And the lion (to look) right at me. You (to ...Â His sister (to read) a book. His mother and grandmother (to talk). 5. I (to write) a letter to my grandmother who (to live) in Novgorod.